Origo Watch

Get More Than the Time of Day

I'M NOT REALLY A GADGET KIND OF GUY. YES, I own a laser range finder and a GPS which I cannot locate (call it irony that I've lost the tool designed to help me find stuff) but that's been about the extent of my list of gadgets, until recently. A few months back I got my hands on an Origo Fishing Pro watch and now have a greater appreciation for the new technology on the market.

Calling this thing a watch is like calling a Ferrari a car. Technically, it is a watch since it does accurately display the current time and date, but if that's all you're using it for you are really missing out. Packed into a package that fits on your wrist is a barometer, altimeter, thermometer, digital dicts tides, gives the best fishing and hunting times, has a soft blue EL backlight (I don't know what EL stands for but it looks cool), and displays sunrise and sunset data. I'm pretty sure by pressing the right combination of buttons it can cook an omelet, change a flat tire, and do your taxes but I haven't dug that deep in the owner's manual yet.

After setting the time for your current location (you have to tell it where you are), inputting the current date, and tide data the watch does the rest and calculates the next best fishing and hunting times. This is great if you are actually out hunting and fishing but highly annoying when you're sitting in an office at work since that little voice in the back of your head keeps telling you "you're sitting in a meeting and the fish are biting."

The tide feature comes in handy when there isn't a newspaper around to tell you when the high and low tides for the day will be. If you have ever parked your truck near the tide line at low tide and came back later to find it hood deep in the surf you'll understand how this feature is helpful.

The Origo Fishing Pro is solidly built (feeling virtually indestructible) and weighs more than a standard wrist watch but this is to be expected when you add all of the features it has. While it cannot make the fish bite it at least provides all the tools you need to optimize your time on the water. <http://www.origowatch.com>
